

Earth Online

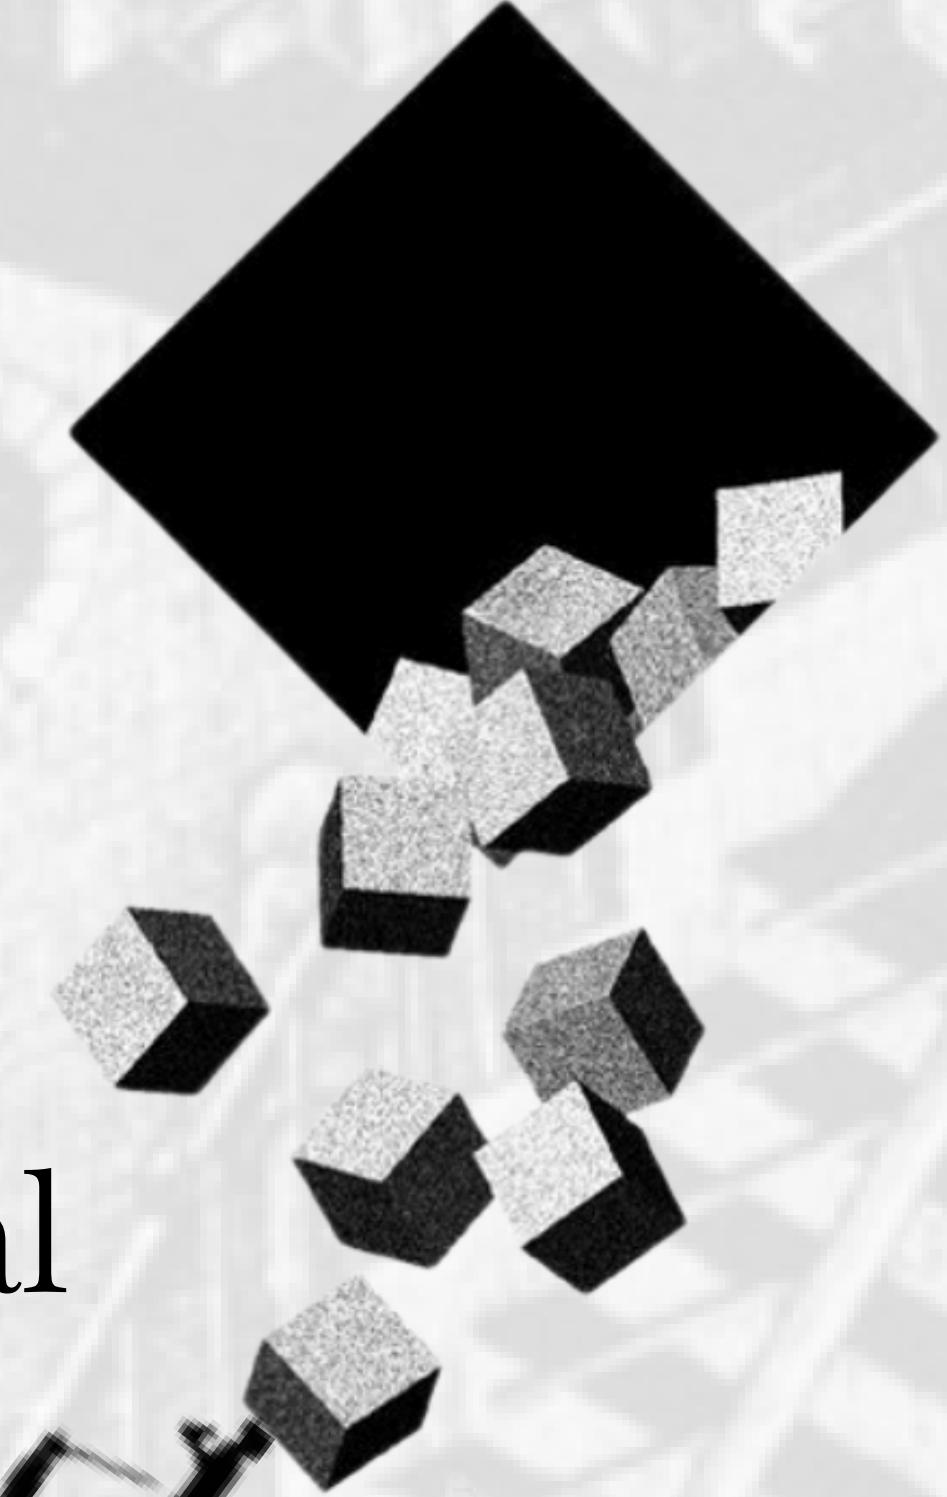

This moodboard grows out of the idea of Earth Online, a world that keeps revealing its layers while pretending to be complete.

Which layer are you at ?

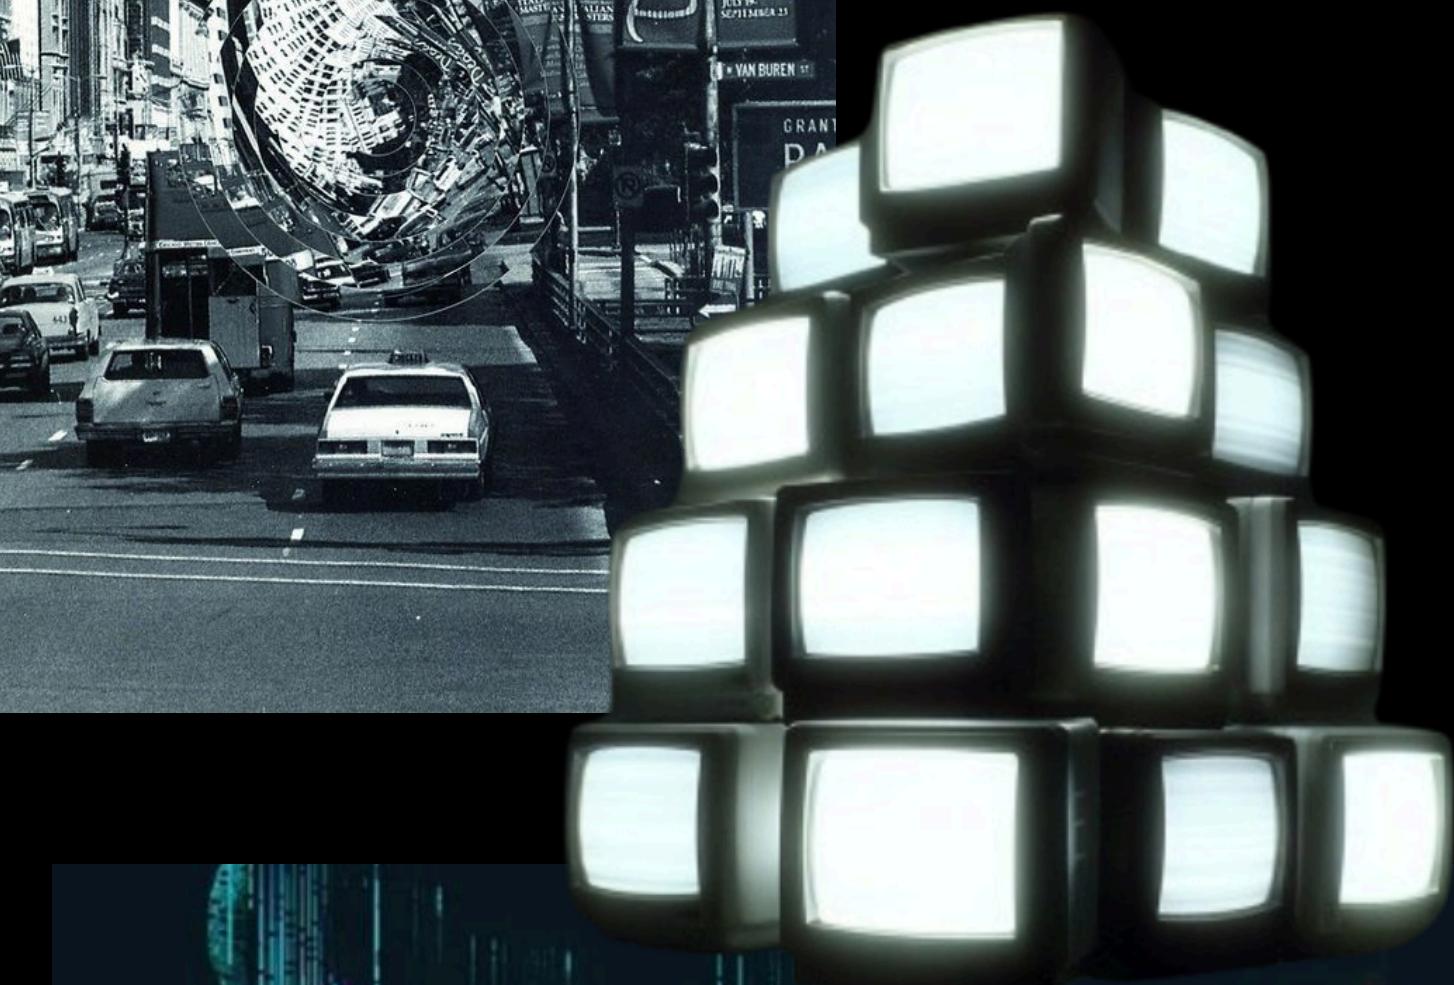

Hyperdimensional
Control

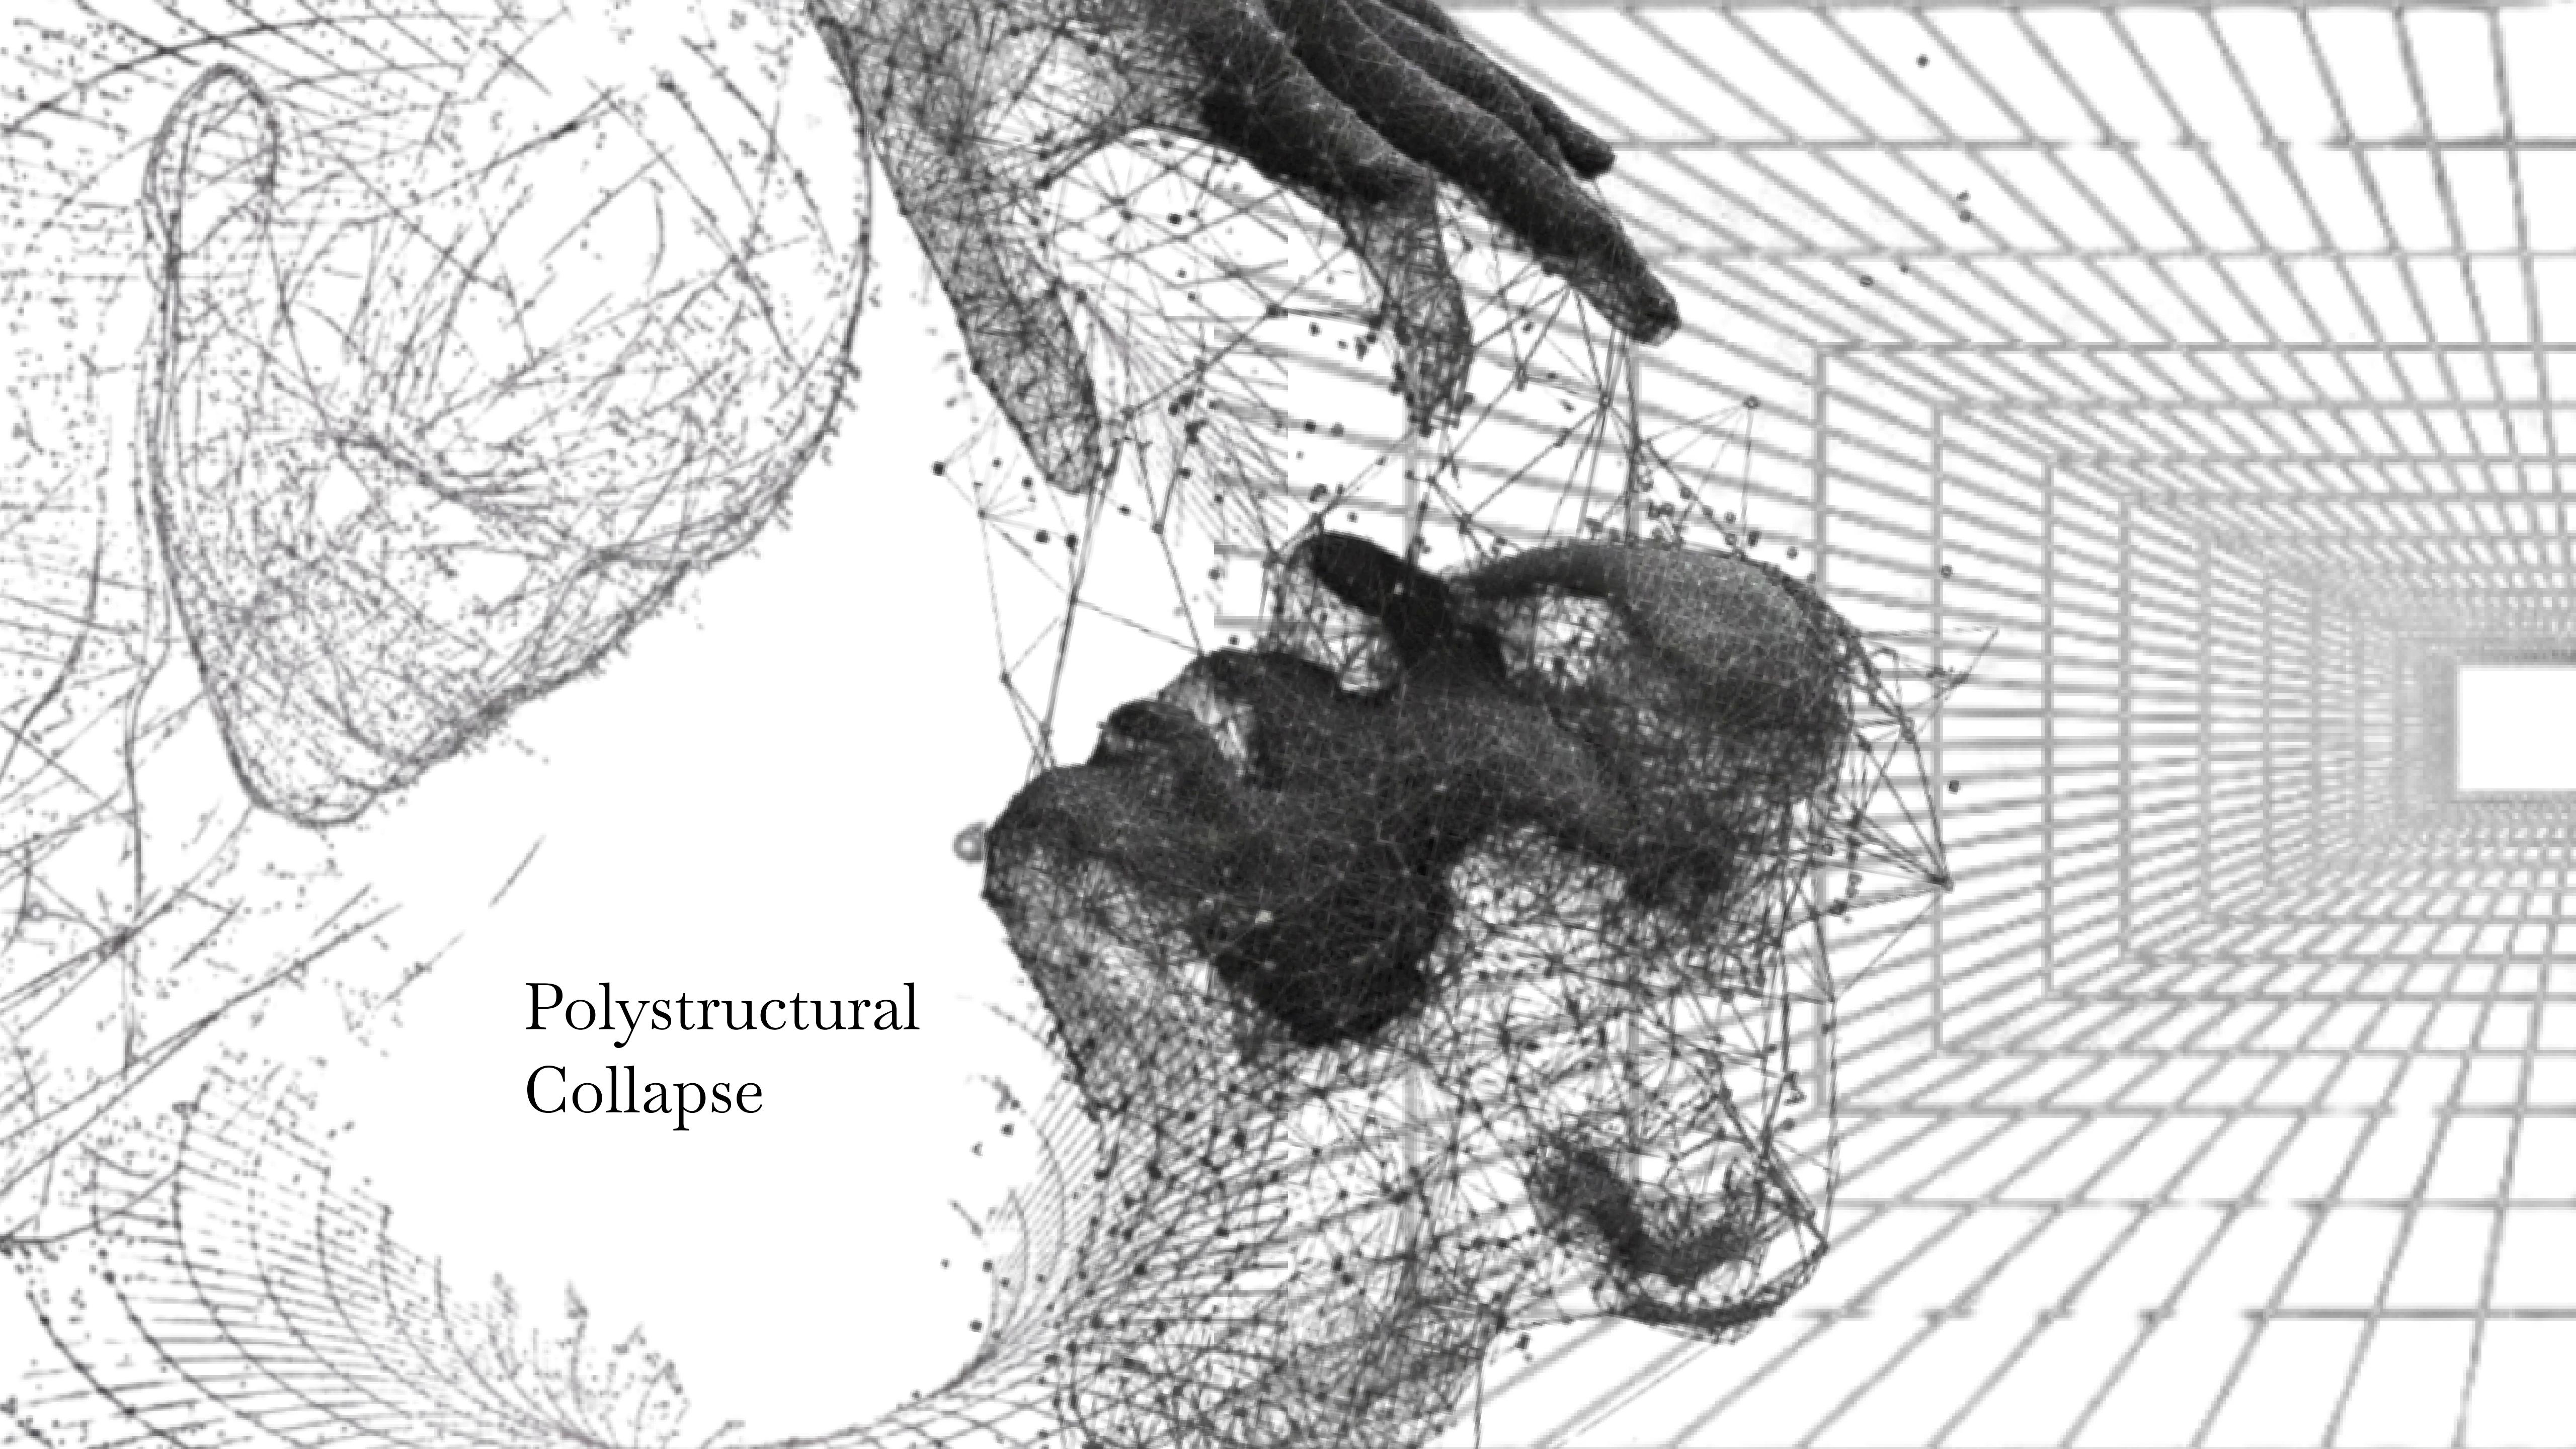

Transdimensional

Earth Online Monitor

Polystructural
Collapse

Reality

Fragmentation

Multiverse Gaze

The first image, “Hyperdimension Control”, presents a poly-structured hand shaping a figure made of pure code. It is the first hint that reality can be engineered, adjusted and rewritten.

The second image, Transdimensional, places a softened Penrose staircase behind a stage that has torn open. The blank space, the falling blocks and the people climbing from another dimension all suggest that space itself can slip, collapse and fold over.

Together they form the first layer of my work, a layer where the real and the illusory constantly exchange positions.

The third group of images collects fragments from computer games, surveillance feeds and glitched screens. Bugs appear when a player stares too long. A robotic hand reaches toward a human hand, recalling creation while exposing the tension between machine, human and the code running beneath both.

The fourth image follows two figures, one looking up and one looking down, points within the same polystructure. They move through a tunnel shaped by three-point perspective, as if pulled through a corridor of time.

These visuals belong to the second and third layer of the work, the game layer, and they anticipate the moment when a car breaks through the player’s monitor, turning the long road into a stretched passage between worlds.

The fifth image shows a single letter falling apart into fragments. It marks the later part of the third layer, where broken pieces begin to serve as material to rebuild time and the idea of existence itself.

The final image is that a figure in meditation watches planets, people and drifting universes. They have no features and no boundaries. They only exist as an infinite surface of awareness. They do not participate, but by observing, they draw everything into a single field.

When we look at this moodboard, we stand where this figure stands. The observer and the experiencer turn out to be the same presence.
